

The STAR method is a gold standard in answering behavioral-based interview question by discussing the specific situation, task, action, and result of the situation you are describing.

- Situation: Describe the situation that you were in when you needed to accomplish. It can be from your current job, previous job or from any relevant experience such as volunteer work or college clubs.
-
- Task: What goal were you working toward? Describe the challenge and what needs to be done to get a positive output?
-
- Action: Elaborate the measures you took to address the situation with an appropriate amount of detail. Describe the precise steps you took and the contribution. Talk about yourself rather than the team.
-
- Result: Describe the outcome of your actions in a quantifiable way. Communicate multiple positive results. If the answers have a negative outcome, they should highlight your resilience or adaptability.

Communicate

No matter if you are in engineering, sales, or marketing, communication plays a critical role for you to be effective at work. Thus, the interviewers will try their best to get a read on your articulation and communication style.

- Explain your solution. The interviewers definitely care whether they have the right answer to the technical questions, but they care even more about your thinking process. Please make sure to explain the thought process why you are approaching the problems in this way.
-
- Be Succinct. Be direct with your answers, especially for your past experience. People care less about all the glory background. Please just share enough so that the interviewer can truly understand what you try to convey. Of course, overly terse is bad too since the interview may not have enough context to appreciate the complexity and significance of your past successes.
-
- Listening. Demonstrate active listening skills, ask clarification questions if needed. Do not rush to answer a question if the interviewer is still trying to explain. By listening, you can get a better sense of what your interviewers are interested in so that you can tailor your response including selecting the right examples to resonate better with the interviewer. Of course, the last thing you want to do is to argue with an interviewer.

Communicate

No matter if you are in engineering, sales, or marketing, communication plays a critical role for you to be effective at work. Thus, the interviewers will try their best to get a read on your articulation and communication style.

- Explain your solution. The interviewers definitely care whether they have the right answer to the technical questions, but they care even more about your thinking process. Please make sure to explain the thought process why you are approaching the problems in this way.
-

- Be Succinct. Be direct with your answers, especially for your past experience. People care less about all the glory background. Please just share enough so that the interviewer can truly understand what you try to convey. Of course, overly terse is bad too since the interview may not have enough context to appreciate the complexity and significance of your past successes.
-
- Listening. Demonstrate active listening skills, ask clarification questions if needed. Do not rush to answer a question if the interviewer is still trying to explain. By listening, you can get a better sense of what your interviewers are interested in so that you can tailor your response including selecting the right examples to resonate better with the interviewer. Of course, the last thing you want to do is to argue with an interviewer.

Co-workers' View of You

What is the interviewer looking for: The interviewer is looking for your self-awareness, knowledge of your strengths, areas of development, with a particular focus on others' perception of you.

Best practice to answer: This is a moment to sing your glory using someone else's voice. A good practice is to quote official performance reviews from your co-workers and seniors. Please make sure to use concrete examples about your contributions to the team, the impact, and the team appreciation. You can tailor your answer to what is critical for the job you are applying to increase your chance of success.

Common pitfalls:

- Try to cover a lot of great things without specific details. Please pick up top three things that are somehow related to the job you are applying. Focus on them by giving specific and concise examples.
-
- Focus too much on yourself. The interviewers who ask this question care more about how well you work with others. Please talk and exhibit your collaboration skills, and how you put the team's interest ahead of your interest.

Question variations:

- When I call your coworkers for reference checking, what will they say about you?
- What will your team miss if you leave tomorrow?

Who is your role model?

What is the interviewer looking for: The interviewer is looking at your thought process about your holistic development, which is often correlated to the kind of leader you want to be. It implies the leadership dimension you value and appreciate. The interviewer will then assess whether this is a good fit for the team.

Best practice to answer: If you have a clear role model, that is great. Please give three reasons about why this person is your role model. It is also perfectly fine to have an abstract role model. Please list three dimensions of the abstract figure. This shows the kind of personality and traits that you want to embody and inspire to be.

Common pitfalls:

- Not substantiating your role model with the traits you want to embody.

Question variations:

- Who is your favorite athlete?
- Who is your favorite CEO?
- Who is your dream manager or teammate?

Why are you interested in this role?

What is the interviewer looking for: The interviewer is trying to understand what drives you, how your values align with the company's, what are the chances to accept the offer if offered, and what is the chance you will do well in this company.

Best practice to answer: Choose an answer where your goals align with the position and also show the value-add to the company. It should be tailored according to the specific job position. Show how your actions and your plans are in harmony. Your knowledge, enthusiasm, and efforts will go a long way in answering this question. A good way to answer this question is to illustrate how well this job aligns with your career goals.

Common pitfalls:

- Having a generic answer for all interviews. You need to go deeper, show what you have learned about the company, why you like it and why you will be a good fit.
-
- Emphasize too much on work-life balance and risk. There is nothing wrong about joining a more stable company due to personal and family needs, but it should be a secondary reason, not the primary reasons, at least in the interview :) In your answer, you should focus on your primary reasons: impact, learning, career growth.

Question variations:

- Why do you want to work here?

- How is this role in alignment with your career goals?
- What do you want to get in your next job?

What drags you out of bed?

What is the interviewer looking for: The interviewer is looking for the motivational factors that keep you going. The interviewer will try to aggregate your answers, your strengths, and your background to form an overall view of you and assess how well you will fit in the team's needs.

Best practice to answer: Talk about what you care most deeply, why it matters to you, and how you have committed 100% of your energy to do things you care, no matter if it is technology advancement, business success, amazing user experience, or learning new things to expedite your growth.

It is ok to joke it is the kids and the alarm that get you up, but please do not stop there :) The interviewers want to know more about what drives you.

Common pitfalls:

- The answer is completely unrelated to the job. Yes, you have your passion, but how will it contribute to your success on the job? Will it become a distraction from your work performance?
-
- Answer targeted entirely towards job description. It is a good idea to connect your answer to the job, but if it is overdone, the interviewer will know you are not being genuine and trying too hard to get the job.

-
- Broad and generic answers that do not seem to be very sincere and genuine. If you are unable to communicate passionately, the interviewer will think either you are not able to communicate well or you are not giving a genuine response.

Question variations:

- What keeps you going?
- If you have achieved financial freedom today, what will you be doing?
- What is your dream job?

Do you have any questions for me?

What is the interviewer looking for: On one side, the interviewer is giving you an opportunity to ask questions so that you have a better understanding of the company. On the other hand, the interviewer is also going to form her opinion about how excited you are with the company, based on the questions you have asked.

Do you have any questions for me?

Best practice to answer: You should think about two things here. One is to ask questions that you still have about the company and the role. Just as the company is interviewing you, you are interviewing it as well. The other is to ask questions that demonstrate your passion, knowledge and thought leadership in this space.

If you do not have questions or your questions are very superficial, it will be a clear indicator that you are not highly interested in the role, or you are not a curious person. Both cases are bad signs to an interviewer.

Below are some sample questions that can help you get started:

- I read the news that xxx is also starting a similar service. What is your take on their move?
- What big trends do you see in xxx space in the next 3 years?
- What 3-5 words will you use to describe the team's culture?
- What are the biggest challenges that someone in this role will face?
- What does your day look like?
- How satisfied is the team with their career development?

Common pitfalls:

- No questions: this shows that you have not researched the company and the role properly, or you are not interested.
-
- Asking very generic questions that can be answered using Google search. This is a very precious moment for you to get meaningful information about the role. Please do not waste it.
-
- Ask too detail questions, such as benefits. This is not the time. You have plenty of time to ask about benefits after you get the offer.

Question variations:

- This is one question that everyone will ask :)

Conflict Resolution with a Colleague

What is the interviewer looking for: The interviewer is looking for the conflict resolution skills and your resilience. The following are a few areas that the interviewer is going to assess you.

- Did you listen well?
- Did you try to fully understand the other party's story?
- Did you work with other parties to come up with a creative solution to resolve the conflict, etc?
- Did you try to resolve the conflict before escalation?

Best practice to answer: Use the STAR framework. Describe the situation and the task. The actions you took to resolve the situation and the result. Ideally, showcase some good moves that you undertook to resolve the conflict. Some sample moves are:

- Proactively reach out to the other party to fully understand their perspective.
- Assume good intent. Do not be judgmental about the other party's move. Most conflicts in a workplace is caused by misinterpreting the other party's intent.
- Steer both parties to find solutions that are optimized for the company and the combined team.
- If needed, escalate to the right authorities in a timely manner.
- After the conflict was resolved, reach out to further strengthen the relationship with the other party.

Common pitfalls:

- A story wherein the conflict was resolved by a third party and your actions were not responsible for resolving it.
- Showing aggression or restlessness.
- Rise of a new conflict.

Question variations:

- How did you resolve conflicts in your team?
- Tell me about a time when you had an issue with a coworker
- How do you handle disagreement with your teammates?
- Tell me about a situation when you had to work in a group that wasn't functioning well. What happened?

Disagree with Leadership

What is the interviewer looking for: The interviewer is looking for your involvement in the decision-making and post-decision process. In particular, how well did you function as a leader to make your voice heard before the decision? And how well did you demonstrate followership to support a decision that you disagree?

Best practice to answer: It is a good practice to share your philosophy about decisions. A good practice is to be actively involved in the decision discussion so that your voice is heard and assist the decision maker to make the right decision with all the relevant data and different perspectives available before the decision making. Once a decision is made, follow and support the decision even if you do not agree. To illustrate active participation during decision process, you should share your perspective and why you prefer this route, how does it compare with the ultimate decision. You should also share how the final decision played out. If it played out well, please share what you have learned from this. If it did not work out, did the team come back to retry with your approach? If it did, what could you have done differently to better influence the team before the decision was made?

Common pitfalls:

- Vague answer with very little focus on how you stood up the ground to make sure your point of view is well heard.
- Do not support the decision, still feel bitter about it.
- Belittling a coworker or your team.

Question variations:

- What do you do if you disagree with your manager?
- Share one experience that you argued forcefully but turned out you were wrong.

Experience of Compromising

What is the interviewer looking for: We have all experienced situations where people share different opinions and are stuck in stalemate since nobody can convince anyone. In such situations, it is often the case that proceeding with any option is better than being stuck. Strong leaders seek to make compromises in such cases so that the team can proceed. It is a critical skill to make the right compromises in any type of organizations. When asking this question, the interviewers are trying to assess your flexibility and your creativity to make the right compromises to resolve conflicts.

Best practice to answer: Without saying, you need to use the STAR method to describe the situation, what you did and the result. Simply making a compromise is never a strong leadership. You need to showcase why making a compromise was the right thing to do in this circumstance, what you did to break the stalemate and how you subsequently resolved the conflict. Make sure you lay the foundation, why different people have different views and how everyone believes theirs is correct. Explain what you did to make sure everyone understood the situation, the compromises that the team had to make and articulate the actions that made a difference.

Common pitfalls:

- You did not go through a thorough analysis or compromised and ended up in a situation that is not necessarily right for the organization.
- You made compromises because you had to, such as pressure from your manager. This is the chance to show your action has made a difference and was not to please someone.

Question variations:

- Share one experience where you stepped back and found a better solution.
- Share an experience that solved a problem by collaborating with others.

Prioritize Many Important Items

What is the interviewer looking for: Conflicting priorities happen on a regular basis to many of us. The interviewers want to hear how you assess the situation and pick up the right tools. Below are some popular ways one can use:

- Deprioritize some items,
- Reduce scope to focus on what you have to get done by the deadline,
- Negotiate the deadline,
- Ask for help, and
- Organize time effectively.

Best practice to answer: Use the STAR framework to choose a situation you were in, the task that had to be done, the challenges you faced, the actions you took and the resulting outcome. Demonstrate how you analyzed the situation, why you decided to take certain actions, why did you de-prioritize some items, how did you get buy-in to reduce scope or change deadline, whom did you go to seek help, your manager or someone else. You want to give an overall picture to illustrate that you are comfortable in using different tools as needed.

Common pitfalls:

- Demonstrating that you were in the situation because of procrastination
- Relying solely on escalation: Escalation is useful and sometimes necessary, but if it is the only way to solve problems, it is likely, something is missing.

Question variations:

- You feel the timeline given by management is unrealistic. How do you handle it?
- How do you manage your time to achieve high efficiency?

Overcome a Project Delay

What is the interviewer looking for: Most projects in the industry are delayed. Thus, this is a true real-life challenge that each one of us will face. Here are a few things that the interviewers might be looking for, in your answer:

- How much real project experience do you have?
- How effectively have you managed the delay?
- How did you handle the stress?

Best practice to answer: Pick up a real life experience. It is perfectly fine to acknowledge that you were part of the reason for the initial delay. It often happens that we uncover new challenges as the project proceeds. What is important is that you are able to discover the delay in a timely manner, maintain cool and calm, analyze the situation, get extra hands, reduce scope, better-streamline dependencies, or motivate your entire team to work extra hours, to turn the project around.

Common pitfalls:

- Claim you are always on time, never experienced a project delay. Seriously? All interviewers know it is not true. Even if you are truthful, it probably shows you do not have much real life project experience.
- Blame the delay on your teammates. It might be the case, but it is never a good practice to blame on your teammates. It is very convenient for you to use them as a good excuse. It is also very convenient for the interviewers to vote you down.

Question variations:

- How do you make sure your projects are on time?
- How do you recognize that your projects are not on the right trajectory?

What is Your Daily Routine?

What is the interviewer looking for: The interviewer is trying to assess the kind of work environment you are familiar with. Is it fast pace or slow pace? If it is a fast pace, how do you manage your priorities and time? From your answer, the interviewer can probably get a good sense on how aggressive you are with your work schedule.

Best practice to answer: Do not simply enumerate the laundry list that you do everyday. That is not what the interviewer is asking for. Instead, focus on how much time you spend on technical work, how much on meetings. Do not forget the time you spend to think and find creative new ways to solve problems. This is also a good opportunity to demonstrate how you keep up with what's new in the industry and commit to learn new things. For example, attending meetups, reading blogs, etc.

In terms of priorities, you may want to cover short-term priorities and medium-term priorities. What tools do you use to keep your day organized? Purely on calendar? Or something else. For medium-term, do you use something like OKRs to keep your priorities structured? Anyway, explain clearly the tools you are using.

When balancing different priorities, please note timeline is not the only factor that drives priority. In the technology world, quality is definitely another key dimension to consider and cover. To launch the right product, in some companies, it is perfectly fine to delay. Make it clear that you manage priorities considering all factors, not just the deadline.

Common pitfalls:

- Get into too much detail about your daily routine detail. Focus on key things, such as how much time do you spend on writing code each day, how much time in meetings.
-
- Be too rigid about your priority. The reality is that in most cases, you prioritize based on what is needed by your work and your family.
-

- Do not cover the time you spend to catch up with the industry and learn new things. It is important for you to show you are a lifetime learner.

Question variations:

- How do you find time to keep yourself updated with what is going on?
- How do you prioritize between timeline, quality, and work life balance?

Working with Difficult People

Questions: Tell me about a time you needed to get information from someone who wasn't very responsive. What did you do?

What is the interviewer looking for: We all run into situations where someone doesn't respond to our emails. There are many possible reasons:

- This person is hard to work with,
- This person does not know you or your project,
- This person is very swamped, and your ask is not even close to the top of their priority list,
- You have done something that offended them, but you are not even aware, or
- Their manager and your manager are not aligned. The person wants to help but got a different direction from their manager.

The interviewers are looking for:

- Your action to uncover the reasons behind this person's lack of response,
- Your concrete steps to win over their support and response, and
- Your ability to seek collaboration when the other party does not seem like collaborative.

Best practice to answer: You should follow the STAR method to explain the situation, in particular, what actions have you taken to uncover the reasons behind this person's lack of response and take appropriate follow-up steps. For example,

- If your project is not high on the person's priority, you should find ways to get priorities aligned. You may be able to do this by stopping by their desk or leveraging your manager or their manager's help.
- If they are swamped with high priority deliverables, can you ask another person to help? Alternatively, can you recommend someone else to help you?
- If the managers are not aligned, should you try to talk to the manager directly or push your manager to work with the other manager to get aligned?

Overall, you need to be empathetic to understand why the person is not very responsive. Do not draw a conclusion that the other person is hard to work with without looking more into their challenges. Once you have a better understanding of the situation, you can come up with the right ways to get help on your project by being assertive without being aggressive.

Common pitfalls:

- Quickly jumping to a conclusion that the person is hard to work with.
- Relying too much on escalation.
- Showing aggression in your communication.

Question variations:

- How do you deal with difficult people on your team?

- How to handle it if another team's priority is not aligned with yours?

Tailor your Style to Drive Success

Question: Tell me about a time you had to adjust to a colleague's style in order to complete a project.

What is the interviewer looking for: Everybody is different. A method may work for some, but may not work for others at all. The most successful individuals know how to tailor their style based on the other person's/team's style and preference. The interviewer is looking for flexibility to form healthy work relationship and get the job done.

Best practice to answer: Use STAR framework, go deep on your effort to understand this person's style, seek advice from others on how to best work with this person, and tailor your message to an approach that is more acceptable to her. Please explain how you were able to figure out ways to partner with her or motivate her to get the project down.

Common pitfalls:

- Sound overly critical about your colleague
- Do not spend enough time to know the colleague

Question variations:

- How do you adapt yourself in adverse team environments?
- How flexible can you be?

Experience of influencing others

Question: Tell me about a time when you had to convince another staff member or leader, whom you had no direct authority over, to buy into a new idea or project? How did you accomplish this?

What is the interviewer looking for: Ability to influence without authority is a key skill at work. No matter whether you are a junior or a senior member, there are times you need to get others to support your plan. The other party could be in your team, in the cross-functional team on the same project, in another project team, or even outside your company. To effectively influence others, one has to communicate well and build trust with others. From your answer, the interviewers can easily tell whether you had experience influencing others. They will be assessing your answer with the following questions in mind:

- How difficult was the situation,
- How do you identify the right stakeholders to influence,
- How sophisticated were your tactics,
- How effective was your approach,
- How well you listened to others' concern, and
- How creative you are to address others' concern

Best practice to answer: First of all, before the persuasion, demonstrate that you have a comprehensive picture of the topic you are trying to influence. Otherwise, you will lose your credibility with the stakeholders. This requires you to identify the right stakeholders and reach out to them, listen to them, capture relevant context, especially key stakeholders' point of view. Secondly, identify the options and the tradeoff between different options, be open to discuss the options and choose the one that works the best for the organization.

In the interview, explain clearly what you have done to identify the options, adjust your proposal based on input from the stakeholders, and drive everyone to agreement and commitment after the decision. Clearly demonstrate it is your stewardship that led to the success of the project.

Common pitfalls:

- Trivial examples. Your example is too trivial, then the interviewer will think you do not have more complicated experience of influencing others.
- Lack of detail on why it was challenging and the actions you have taken to win over others' support

Question variations:

- Describe a situation that you successfully convinced someone to support your idea
- Describe a case you have convinced your manager to change her view on something.
- Describe a case that you successfully assembled a team to support your initiative.

Do Something Completely Unexpected

What is the interviewer looking for: The interviewer is evaluating

- Your response to the unexpected
- Your learning from the unexpected to become stronger

Unexpected

Best practice to answer: Use the STAR framework and describe the Situation and the Task. The action you took to resolve it and it's outcome. Focus on how you responded the unexpected with positive energy, list the research you have done to understand the challenge and the approaches you have identified to solve the problem, the challenges you have faced along the way and the final outcome. Do not forget to mention what you have learned in the journey and how the experience positively impacted your career.

Common pitfalls:

- Lack of specifics. It is critical to have enough detail to make people believe in your story. Without enough detail, the interviewers may conclude that you have made it up.
-
- The unexpected thing in your story should have been expected with people at your experience level. If this is the case, in the interviewer's mind, she will start to form negative view about you.

Question variations:

- How do you deal with unexpected tasks and situations at work?
-
- Give me an example of when you went into firefighting mode.
-
- What happens when you need to change what you are doing at your work?
-
- Tell me about a time when you had to assess and work through an unexpected situation in order to get your work done.

What Have You Learned Recently?

Detail Question: What is the last thing you learned about xxx from a book, magazine or website?

What is the interviewer looking for: The interviewer is assessing your zest to remain updated in the ever-changing world.

Best practice to answer: Have the list of your favorite books and your key takeaway from these books, your websites, apps, blogs or podcast and why you like them. Sure, you should answer what you have learned, but more importantly, go the extra mile to comment on related books or podcasts to show that you are active at learning and getting informed.

Common pitfalls:

- Unable to articulate one thing that you have learned recently. It is always a good practice to pay extra attention to the news while you are heading to interviews since some news topic may come up in the interview.
-
- Unable to even name a few books, blogs, or podcasts. This only shows you are closed and probably not well informed by the new development in the industry.
-
- Mentioning something that is very mundane or you are expected to know.

Question variations:

- How do you stay current with your knowledge?
- What is the most innovative thing you've read this year?
- Who is your favorite author? What is your favorite book?
- Give an example where you learned something really quick.

Failure Experience

What is the interviewer looking for: The interviewer is evaluating

- Your journey of handling obstacles
- Critical thinking ability to analyze when you failed
- Your ability to learn from failure or setbacks

Best practice to answer: Choose a failure where you can tell a story. It needs to be very specific. Define what the failure meant to you. Describe the situation, and explain why it was a challenge. Then mention the actions you took and the outcome. Finally, sum it up with the learnings from the failure that make you a stronger individual.

Common pitfalls:

- Answer that you haven't failed or chosen an insignificant failure: Come on, let us face it. We are all human beings. Each of us must have experienced some failure, catastrophic or not. A failure that had a significant impact on you due to your actions is a good example. An insignificant example will only lead the interviewer to think you are not genuine or do not have considerable life experience.

-
- Lack of specifics. The interviewers may conclude that you have made it up. Please see the the STAR framework.
-
- Too much detail: Try not setting up the ground for too long and come to the gist. Too much detail will give the impression that you are not concise.
-
- Missed what you have learned: You get overly excited or emotional about your experience and forget to sum up what you have learned and how this experience helped your personal development.

Question variations:

- How do you learn from failures?
- How do you handle failures?

Proud Leadership Experience

Questions: Tell me about a leadership experience that you are most proud of.

What is the interviewer looking for: Obviously, the expectation of leadership varies drastically based on your experience level. For a junior member, the interviewers will likely look for :

- Demonstrate and drive accountability,

- Take initiatives, and
- Foster collaboration among team members.

For a more senior candidate, the interviewers will likely look for:

- Establish vision,
- Get buy-in across the organization,
- Orchestrate the execution of a large-scale initiative, and
- Drive changes

Best practice to answer: It is impossible for you to cover every dimension of leadership. Please select a story that can primarily highlight one aspect of leadership that you want the interviewer to take away. Your primary goal is for the interviewer to remember the initiatives you had undertaken, the magnitude of the accomplishment, and the most significant leadership dimension you had demonstrated. To make sure your message genuinely stands out, you can provide a brief at the end of the story.

You may want to tell different stories depending who is asking the question since a hiring manager or a teammate may appreciate different things. It is perfectly fine for you to use the same story, but may want to emphasize different elements based on what you know about the interviewer.

Please make sure to be specific about the details of the project and what you did for it to be successful. There are many factors that contribute to the success of an initiative. You want to make the interviewer believe your leadership has played a critical role in the success.

Common pitfalls:

- Loopholes in your story. If things do not add up together, you will lose credibility and there is no way for you to get a high evaluation from the interviewer.

- Lack of specific detail. Some stories may have happened many years ago and you no longer remember all the details. Please make sure look it up to get critical details including the numbers.
- Try to cover everything. If you try to cover everything, the interviewer can easily read your intention and question the truthfulness.

Question variations:

- Tell me a successful project that you were part of
- Tell me an experience that you have driven a change successfully

Your Leadership Style?

What is the interviewer looking for: We all want to work with strong individuals, and most of us do not want to work with jerks no matter how strong this individual is. When an interviewer asks for this question, she is trying to understand:

- What is your leadership style?
- Will you be a good fit for the company?
- Are you easy to work with?
- Does she want you to be her teammate?

Best practice to answer: Be genuine. Share the true leadership traits that you have heard others describe you. Do not try to be someone you are not. Use some light-weight examples to support your statement, but do not go into too much detail. The interviewer is asking for others perception about you. Too many details imply, you are trying too hard. For example, if you say you bring positive energy and fun to the team, you can give examples on how many team events you organize, either ad-hoc or planned, but no need to go into specific detail for the events since they are not important for the question. Again, 3 is the magic number. Please pick up three things to describe your own leadership style. At the end, do a brief summary so that the interviewer has the best chance to capture and appreciate it.

Common pitfalls:

- Too verbose, unnecessarily get into too much detail
- Answering the question without examples. Do not be fooled by this question. It does not ask for examples specifically, but it does not mean the interviewer does not expect it from you.
- Pick up controversial leadership dimension. Please note the interviewer is also assessing whether she wants to be your teammate.

Question variations:

- What's your leadership style?
- Which leadership trait do you wish to have but you do not possess today?

Have you mentored someone?

What is the interviewer looking for: Life is full of give and take. When you mentor others, you are not only helping others, but also learn from them and improve yourself. How much you are willing to give has big impact on how far you can go with your career. For this question, the interviewer is looking for:

- Your willingness to help people
- How effective you are as a mentor or advisor

Best practice to answer: After you give a positive answer to the question, pick up one or two stories on what you did. Please make sure to cover enough detail. Are these people in your company or outside? Did you help them on the technical dimension or other aspects? What are the top advices you think worked really well for your mentees? What have you learned in this process? These are all great points to make.

Common pitfalls:

- Simply answer “No”: In reality, you must have helped somebody, even if in your college. It does not have to be an official mentor-mentee relationship. Pick someone that you have provided meaningful help and improved her chance of success.

-
- Lack of specifics. The interviewers may conclude that you have not really done it if you do not include specific examples.
-
- Too much detail: The interviewer just wants to make sure. Too much detail will give him/her impression that you are not concise.

Question variations:

- What is your view on mentorship?
- How do you help your teammates when needed?